

Why ruin a good thing? XM Radio has only just started offering traffic & weather stations 24hours/7days a week, and already the FCC is whining about it? Why? These particular stations don't use any profanity. Why censor a useful station that gives info that Americans needs? XM channels 210-240 are used for traffic & weather/time only. Most of their info comes from other drivers calling in accidents and/or traffic jams in metropolis areas, as well as TrafficPulse. The weather information is provided by the Weather Channel, which coincidentally has it's own station on XM and Sirius radios. It's not much different than an AM station that give traffic information for certain highways, except it can be heard without having to be on the road in the first place, therefore avoiding the headache of waiting in bumper to bumper traffic or hazardous driving conditions.

If the FCC has any complaints on Satellite radios, maybe they should be reminded that these stations are not for free! They are $9.99 a month ($12.99 a month for Sirius) and the only really explicit language station on XM costs an extra $2.99 a month. (Not worth the extra money in my opinion.)

If these stations are blocked, then why did satellite radio become invented in the first place? My only wish, is that this service eventually becomes international.
